ABSTRACT

This guide lists academic resources in the United States which may assist educators working with Indochinese children. The institutions where teachers can obtain information and/or assistance are listed alphabetically by state. Under each institution is given the name of the department or program doing work in the following fields: (1) linguistics, (2) teaching English as a foreign language, (3) bilingual education, (4) South East Asian studies, (5) Vietnamese, and (6) Cambodian. The introduction to the list has a note on the kinds of help one can expect from each discipline. (Author/TL)

GENERAL INFORMATION SERIES: Academic Resources

This year, because of the large number of Vietnamese and Cambodian refugee children entering the American school system, educators have become increasingly aware of the problems involved in teaching children from different cultural and linguistic backgrounds. Experienced and inexperienced teachers, as well as state education agency personnel, will therefore find it useful to know what academic resources are available within their own state to assist them in working with Indochinese children.

The following is a list of institutions, alphabetically by state, where teachers can obtain information and assistance. Under each institution is given the name of the department or program (when known) doing work in the following fields: linguistics (L), teaching English as a foreign language (E), bilingual education (B), South East Asian studies (A), Vietnamese (V), and Cambodian (C).

What follows is a brief note about the kinds of help you can expect from each discipline. Linguistics is the study of the nature and use of language. This can be a purely theoretical study, but most schools teaching linguistics also have a number of courses designed to apply the theory to practical situations such as teaching English to speakers of other languages (TESOL),* bilingual education, or language analysis. Therefore, most schools listed as teaching linguistics will be able to provide information in three areas: linguistics, teaching English to speakers of other languages, and bilingual education.

*Also known as TEFL (Teaching English as a Foreign Language) and TESL (Teaching English as a Second Language).

ED116491

FL007369

Several schools have special programs designed to train teachers for the fields of TESOL and bilingual education. These will be able to provide more specific help in these fields. In addition, most of these programs include courses in basic linguistics.

There are a large number of schools in this country which provide instruction in English as a foreign or second language. The courses vary from intensive programs where the students spend all their time studying English, to special sections of regular college English courses. Some provide for various levels of proficiency while others are geared to only one level. All should be able to provide information about methodology for teaching English to Vietnamese and Cambodian students. On the other hand, all have one drawback: since they are designed for adult students the teachers may have had little or no experience in teaching children. Therefore, these programs will be most helpful to teachers working on the college or adult education levels.

For those teachers who are interested in further information about the culture and language of the refugee children the list also includes institutions which have special centers or departments for the study of South East Asia, and those which offer courses in Vietnamese and Cambodian.

This is an abbreviated guide for the purpose of locating quickly the nearest resource institution that can provide help in a particular field. We have tried to be thorough, but because of time limitations we have worked quickly. Any errors or omissions will be corrected in future bulletins.

Teachers who are interested in taking formal courses should consult the following books which list courses offered and certificates or degrees granted.
